

Statement on Appropriate Use of Electronic Resources

The licensed electronic resources made available by the University Libraries are for research, instruction, and related activities of current George Mason University faculty, students, staff and other authorized users. U.S. Copyright Law (including the protections of “fair use”) and contractual license agreements govern the access, use, and reproduction of these resources. In general, authorized users may access such resources for noncommercial, educational, scholarly and research purposes.

Prohibited actions generally include:

- Sharing of passwords or authorized access codes
- Large-scale systematic downloading of articles or other information
- Modifying, altering or creating derivative works
- Using in electronic course packs or e-reserves without appropriate permissions
- Sharing content, either electronically or hard-copy form, outside of Mason students, faculty and staff
- Posting copyrighted materials on a publicly accessible web site or listserv
- Resale or commercial exploitation of licensed information

Please Be Aware:

1. Sharing an access password with unauthorized users—including family, friends, or co-workers—may result in suspension or revocation of library privileges. Non-affiliated users may, however, access most electronic library resources from computer terminals in a campus library.
2. Downloading entire issues of electronic journals, or attempting to create large databases from bibliographic files, is generally prohibited by publisher license agreements. Systematic downloading of content—manually or with specialized software—is detectable by publishers and traceable to specific computer addresses.
3. Engaging in actions intended to circumvent or defeat access control mechanisms of the Library or information provider may result in revocation of library privileges and other campus or civil disciplinary measures.
4. Sharing proprietary or client software connected to information resources, such as that used to analyze spatial data or search and retrieve texts, is also prohibited under the terms of academic licenses.
5. Committing a breach of the University’s contractual arrangements with publishers could result in the suspension of access to the resources for the entire George Mason University community.
6. Depending upon the nature and scope of the infraction, authorized users may also be subject to local, state, federal or international penalties.

These policies and guidelines are in conformance with Mason’s Responsible Use of Computing policy, Use and Reproduction of Copyrighted Materials, and other campus policies governing use of computing networks. Questions about the appropriate use of licensed information resources may be directed to John Walsh, University Libraries Collection Development Officer.
